So different to the standard Red Hill bottling. Deeper and darker, closed rather than open and forward. There's a whole rack of brown spices and cloves smothering the red fruit, firming the palate and leaving more assertive chalky tannins with a Campari note to finish. Drink the standard now, leave this in the cellar to unfurl.

It's a pinot noir with a bit of brood to it. It's as much red-berried as it is black, but it sits low on the palate, as if grumbling about something. It's not a bad way for a young pinot noir to present. It's flecked with spice, woodsmoke, orange rind and musk, the palate offering both tang and cream but mostly savoury-accented fruit. Sticks and stones, so to speak. It's good now but it will get better.
